Student to Alum: Bridging the Gap

Whenever I engage in conversation with alumni the comments I hear most frequently are how “cool” it must be to work back on campus. While I admit that I have a pretty great job, my favorite thing is not necessarily being back on the beautiful grounds of Salisbury University, but rather meeting our students and getting to know them on a personal level.

Like most jobs, there are good days and bad days, but when I am having a bad day, the best remedy is for me to get out of the office and take a stroll across campus through Red Square and up the Pergola to the University Center. While the campus has grown in size over the years, there is still a small school feel to it and I’m bound to run into a student that I know. We’ll talk about classes or a student organization they are involved with and it’ll put my job into perspective. I’m here because of them.

I’m going on my fourth year as your alumni director and have really tried hard to bridge the gap between the Alumni Association and our student body. The creation of the Student Alumni Council, senior programming efforts, the student Phonathon and my involvement in student life as a campus organization advisor and staff leader on the New Student Experience have helped to put the Alumni Association in the minds of our students. My hope is that when they graduate, they’ll be educated on what it really means to be a Salisbury alumnus.

Joining the alumni ranks this spring will be over 1,200 graduates, the most in school history. When you see them at chapter events or at Homecoming, please welcome them into the Alumni Association. You might be pleasantly surprised at the conversations you’ll have with them!
